Praying For Haiti

Last week the Vatican's newspaper reported that just six weeks after the catastrophic earthquake, the plight of Haitians has already become old news, even though the situation remains "dramatic." L'Osservatore Romano (LOR) observed that the decrease in interest can be seen in the declining presence of international media on the island and in the fact that relief and reconstruction activities are suffering from a lack of supervision.

The president of Haiti, Rene Preval, expressed his concerns to members of the Unity Summit of Latin American and Caribbean nations in Mexico last week, saying that despite the enormous amount of support offered to the nation, the recovery will be slow, expensive and difficult. He drew attention to the fact that "every day a million Haitians sleep in the street, with problems made even graver by the rains of these days."

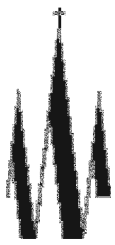

Caritas Haiti and Caritas members working in the country have available warehouses, pre-positioned relief supplies, over 200 medical centres, hundreds of staff and a strong community network of volunteers that are being used to deliver aid. Caritas Internationalis has a team of international staff on the ground supporting the national operations in areas including food, shelter, sanitation, communications and logistics and will be committed to the people of Haiti for the long term.

Let us keep the leaders and citizens of Haiti in our prayers.

PROJECT COMPASSION – WEEK 2

This week we look at Indigenous Australia Teneille's Story

"After school I get changed and go to Kids Club with my brother. We join with the other kids to practise craft, reading and sports. You can invite new kids to Kids Club, learn healthy ways of living and about the local culture of the Kimberley and its people," explains Teneille, 9.

Since 2008 Caritas Australia has supported Jalaris Aboriginal Corporation to run the Kids Future Club in Derby, a small coastal town 200km north of Broome. Many of Derby's Indigenous families have low literacy levels and limited job opportunities, and are affected by poor health and housing — some of the complex issues underlying truancy and poor school performance among the area's children.

The Caritas-supported program takes a holistic approach to increasing school attendance and raising academic performance for truanting children, including running an afternoon 'Kids Club' where Aboriginal children and their parents can become familiar with structured education, health and nutrition in a culturally relevant way.

The Kids Club sees the wellbeing of children as embedded in that of their parents and extended family. As well as providing a safe and supportive play environment, the whole family is encouraged to get involved in the women's room, drop in centre and mobile health clinic. Elders and parents run music, story telling and painting activities as well as visits to historical sites and bush medicine trips. "I've gone on bush hunting, fishing and gathering trips with the elders — I love it!" explains Teneille.

Teneille is one of more than 160 children who have attended Kids Club since it opened. Jasmine, (Teneille's mum and the Education Supervisor) tells us: "Far more kids show up each day than we anticipated — we planned for 15 but have as many as 44 kids here!"

A strong team of Aboriginal child education workers has been built through the program's focus on developing local capacity in child development, education and health. Project staff are now able to demonstrate teaching methods that address participation barriers for Aboriginal children at local schools. Through taking on feedback from kids, families and local agencies, the project staff are providing positive experiences of education, health and nutrition — and Derby's Aboriginal children are getting on track with the education system.

"We have noticed the parents are more aware of play-based learning, and engaging their children in literacy and numeracy activities. Families are more knowledgeable about and supportive of their children's education and health. There is increased confidence and trust in the value of education and structured learning," Jasmine reflects. The wider community has also benefited through a reduction in petty crime, increased employment, and improvements in community participation and health.

While she used to resist going to school, Teneille now attends every day — and looks forward to it. "She is more confident about school and is a good role model for the younger kids. She has a lot more confidence, so mixes with other kids more now. Teneille encourages them to join activities, learn how to use paints, to spell or count, or use the computer and she's more active with sports. She takes pride in being part of Kids Club," Jasmine explains.

Teneille tells us: "When I finish school I'd like to be in the army to help my people, to support them. I'd like to travel from one end of the earth to another to achieve peace."
